Tower House is a Grade II listed house in Barnsbury, Islington that has been renovated and extended by Dominic McKenzie Architects. The original house was constructed in 1824 and had previously been extended to the rear in the 1980s. This previous addition was poorly insulated and contained the house's only bathroom – located a full storey below the bedrooms.

The new 2½ storey rear extension, which replaces the 1980s extension, creates a slender tower at the back of the house – giving the project its name. This vertical element was inspired by the towers constructed by competing merchants in the Italian hill town of San Gimignano.

The upper part of the tower contains a new bathroom which is now located in much closer proximity to the bedrooms. Beneath the bathroom a dramatic new 1½ storey space is created which contains the lower ground floor dining room. This is discovered on arrival via a new balcony from the existing staircase half-landing.

To the rear of the dining room, a new timber sash window echoes the retained sash window at the rear of the bathroom, but is considerably taller (3.5m). Similarly the two timber French doors adjacent are 3m high. These large glazed elements produce a playful, unexpected shift in scale on entry to the lower ground floor and garden.

Within the main house the original period details have been retained and carefully restored. The bespoke lower ground floor kitchen and master bedroom storage was created by a specialist joiner to DMA's design.

The remodelled rear garden comprises a series of planted terraces which step down towards the lower ground floor level from the original rear garden level. A large portion of the existing garden was excavated to achieve this, allowing the lower ground to be fully connected with the garden – previously the basement dining room looked in to a drainage gully. The terraces, steps and patio and lower garden walls are clad in York stone to materially unify the garden.

Like is often the case when working with listed buildings, approval for the project required a large amount of tenacity and multiple planning / listed building applications, plus an Appeal to get to the right approved design suitable for construction.

The initial planning application proposed a single storey application at lower ground and an extension at roof level - to fill in the gap between two neighbouring roof extensions. The roof extension was to have been detailed in a completely conventional way, however the proposal ran up against a Conservation Department moratorium on roof extensions in the street and following discussion with the planning officer, we were forced to withdraw this initial application. After review, the client decided to temporarily shelve the idea of the roof extension to concentrate on the lower part of the house.

Perhaps because of the initial negativity regarding the roof extension, the council seemed to be much more accepting of our second planning / listed building application, in which the lower extension was enlarged to a single storey part, plus an additional taller part – what became 'the tower'. This application went through very smoothly, but with one sticking point. Despite being willing to permit the larger extension (i.e. the one that was eventually built) the Conservation Department would not agree to us enlarging the lower ground floor opening between the new extension and original house interior (from the existing single window/ door width). This would have left the new extension effectively separated from the main body of the house with the resulting interior room in the main house unnecessarily dark and unusable. Unfortunately the council would not move from the position, so we were forced to accept the approval with this small connection between new and old.

Following Approval, we then submitted a further listed building application with the proposed design exactly the same as before, except for an enlarged opening between the new and the old at lower ground floor. When two months or so later this was inevitably refused we then proceeded straight to Appeal.

A Householder Appeal is a quicker process than Appeals for larger projects, nevertheless it was a further 3 or 4 months before the Appeal Inspector visited the house. An Appeal Inspector is appointed by the Secretary of State to review the proposals objectively against local and national planning policy is meant to review a case objectively - they come in from Bristol where they are based and so are independent from the mindset of local Conservation departments. Prior to the visit both the design team and the council were given an opportunity to put their positions in writing. Thankfully, following our written testimony and the site visit, the Appeal Inspector saw the reasonableness of our proposal to enlarge the lower ground floor opening and 'allowed' the Appeal. We were then able begin the construction detailing, the work towards tender and eventually the construction of the project. Since completion, the project has been published internationally, it won the 2019 Don't Move Improve award for Best Historic Intervention and was going to be on the cover star of a forthcoming RIBA book called 'How to extend your Victorian terraced house', until it fell down on the technicality that the house is in fact late Georgian rather than Victorian - which was a shame. With the completion of the Tower House project, this only leaves the roof extension for the future...
